

There are many benefits why live music is better than recorded music. When listening to recorded music, you can not tell what players are feeling based on their body emotions and do not get the same experience listening to what is happening when listening to it live. Part of listening is watching the player and would not be the same without it. Every part of the concert from entering to waiting in your seats to listening to the different pieces contribute to the experience that you get at a concert.

Another benefit of listening to live music is how they express themselves while playing. How they use dynamics in the music helps set the mood of the piece. How they play the piece also contributes to the mood and every noise made while listening helps contribute to the feeling you get watching musicians play. You do not get the entire experience while just listening to recorded music and it is way different.

My final point is that live music is unique. There is nothing that you can have to make recorded music sound the same and the experience can't be replicated. All of the instruments working together inside a concert hall is one of a kind. It will always sound better from an instrument than from a tv or a phone. Watching live music is better in every way than listening to recorded music in many different ways. It will always be because of how unique live music is, the emotions in it and the experience you get from watching it.
