

What makes live music more exciting than recorded music?

By: Aiden Lee

Live music is much more captivating than recorded music, both for the audience and the performers. Live music hooks the audience and makes them interested in the performance. When a person listens to live music, they are able to see the effect the music has on the players and the emotion on their faces. The performance is right in front of the audience, so there is a much stronger connection between the spectators and the players.

Despite some benefits, recorded music has many disadvantages. Recorded music can be played over and over again, without the need to go to a concert, but it's a much duller version of a piece than live music. Recorded music makes it more difficult to connect the performers and the audience, decreasing the listener's amount of emotion when listening to a piece. Recorded music is often modified by editing technology, so it is more artificial when compared to live music. Listeners also might become bored after replaying recorded music.

Live music can only be listened to a single time, so the performance is much more important to the audience than a recorded version of the piece. It is possible that the audience might hear the same piece again in another performance or recording, but the experience will be very different. The different performers will have different emotions and tones when compared to the first time the audience listened to the song, so the audience will have a new encounter with the music. Live music also creates an aura of magnificence when the audience is right in front of the performers. Even though recorded music might be more convenient and attainable, it doesn't have the same value of listening to live music.
